ANGER ALCHEMY

A Guided Reflection for Hearing the Message,
Regulating the Reaction & Choosing the Response

FEEL. LISTEN. RESPOND.

TO THY OWN SELF BE TRUE

The Inner Work Collection

Before You Begin

Anger is a normal human emotion. It can signal threat, unfairness, crossed boundaries, frustration, grief, exhaustion, or the feeling that something important is not being heard. The problem is not that anger exists. The question is what happens next.

The original Queens Peace Palace worksheet explored inward, outward and passive expressions of anger, along with communication, triggers, personal time, problem-solving, forgiveness and journaling. This edition keeps that foundation while centering one of the strongest ideas from the original: anger can be listened to as information without being allowed to run the entire situation.

> Your anger is allowed to have a voice.
> It does not need to have the steering wheel.

A note on safety & support

This workbook is for personal reflection and education. It is not therapy, diagnosis, crisis care, or a substitute for professional anger-management treatment. If anger is leading to threats, violence, self-harm, destruction, or fear for anyone's safety, pause the workbook and seek qualified professional or emergency support appropriate to the situation.

YOUR INTENTION

What would a healthier relationship with your anger make possible in your life?

How does anger move through you?

The original worksheet named three common directions anger can take. Use these as reflection categories rather than boxes you have to fit into.

- INWARD - I turn anger against myself through harsh self-talk, self-punishment, withdrawal, or denying my own needs.
- OUTWARD - I direct anger toward people, objects, or situations through shouting, insults, aggressive behavior, or destructive actions.
- PASSIVE - I express anger indirectly through sarcasm, resentment, avoidance, the silent treatment, or withholding.

Which expression feels most familiar to you? What does it usually look like?

What tends to happen after the anger passes?

- I regret what I said or did
- I feel ashamed or guilty
- I stay angry for a long time
- I minimize what happened
- I blame myself
- I blame everyone else
- I feel relieved
- I shut down
- Other: _____

If your anger could speak, what would it say?

One of the most powerful ideas in your original worksheet was to imagine anger as a part of you trying to communicate something. Sometimes the message is: listen to me, respect me, stop crossing this line, this is unfair, I am overwhelmed, I need space, I am hurt.

Think of a recent moment when you became angry. What happened?

Under the anger, I may also have felt...

- ■ Hurt
- ■ Disrespected
- ■ Ignored
- ■ Rejected
- ■ Embarrassed
- ■ Powerless
- ■ Overwhelmed
- ■ Afraid
- ■ Disappointed
- ■ Jealous
- ■ Grief
- ■ Exhausted
- ■ Other: _____

If the anger were protecting something important, what would it be protecting?

What did you need in that moment that you did not know how to ask for?

Notice the spark before the fire.

The original worksheet emphasized learning your triggers and reducing avoidable escalation. Knowing a trigger is not the same as demanding that the world never trigger you. It gives you earlier information about when you may need a pause, boundary, conversation, or different plan.

My most common anger triggers are...

My early warning signs are...

- Jaw or shoulders tighten
- Heart rate changes
- Face/body feels hot
- Voice gets louder
- I interrupt
- I become sarcastic
- I start rehearsing arguments
- I want to leave
- I shut down
- I feel restless
- Other: _____

Where do you notice anger in your body first?

What can you do at the FIRST sign of escalation - before you reach the point where choice feels harder?

Create space between feeling and action.

The goal is not to become emotionless. It is to give yourself enough space to decide whether your first impulse is actually the response you want attached to your name, relationships and future.

MY INTERRUPTION PLAN

When I notice _____, I will _____ before I speak or act.

Three things that genuinely help me settle enough to think clearly are...

Palace Pause
Taking space is not the same as using silence to punish someone. A healthy pause has a purpose: “I'm too activated to communicate well right now. I need a little time, and I will come back to this.”

Turn anger into communication.

Your original worksheet encouraged calm communication, “I” statements, and listening to understand rather than only listening to respond. This page turns that advice into practice.

What I WANT to yell, accuse, or say when I'm activated:

What I am actually trying to communicate:

Rewrite it:

“I feel _____ when _____ because _____. What I need / am asking for is _____.”

Write your version:

What might the other person be trying to communicate that you have not fully heard yet?

What actually needs to be solved?

The original worksheet emphasized solution-based thinking. Anger can identify a problem, but repeating the problem does not automatically create a solution.

The facts of the situation - without insults, assumptions or exaggeration - are:

What part is within my control?

What part is outside my control?

What is one reasonable next action?

Ask yourself:
Do I want relief, revenge, understanding, repair, distance, a boundary, an apology, a changed behavior - or an actual solution?

Honor the message without excusing the harm.

Sometimes anger points toward a real boundary violation. Sometimes our interpretation is incomplete. Sometimes both people contributed to the conflict. Self-awareness means being willing to protect yourself and correct yourself.

Was a boundary actually crossed? If yes, what boundary?

What part of my reaction am I responsible for, regardless of what the other person did?

Is there anything I misunderstood, assumed, exaggerated, or need more information about?

If I owe an apology, what would accountability sound like without excuses?

Not every anger needs a permanent home.

Your original worksheet connected anger management with compassion, forgiveness and letting temporary situations pass. Forgiveness is personal and does not require reconciliation, renewed access, or pretending harm did not happen. Sometimes release simply means deciding the event will not keep occupying the same amount of space inside you.

What am I still carrying that the original event is no longer asking me to carry?

What would releasing some of this anger give back to me?

What can I release WITHOUT removing a necessary boundary?

Release does not erase discernment.
You can stop feeding anger and still remember what the experience taught you.

Let anger be felt without letting it become your identity.

The original worksheet included affirmations about feeling anger without exploding, communicating respectfully, admitting mistakes and choosing calm. These statements keep that intention while making room for the emotion itself.

“I can feel anger without becoming destructive.”

“My anger can inform me without controlling me.”

“I can communicate a boundary without humiliating another person.”

“I am allowed to pause before I respond.”

“I can admit when I am wrong without abandoning myself.”

“Peace does not require me to pretend nothing happened.”

Write three statements that speak directly to YOUR anger pattern.

1.

3.

What do you want your anger to become?

Anger carries energy. The work is deciding where that energy goes.

The next time I feel anger rising, I want to notice...

Instead of my usual reaction, I want to practice...

A boundary I need to communicate more clearly is...

A conversation I may need to have when I am calm is...

One way I can give myself more restoration before resentment builds is...

THE PALACE CHECK-IN

Do not ask only, “Did I get angry?” Ask: “Did I recognize it sooner? Did I understand what it was telling me? Did I reduce harm? Did I choose my response more intentionally?”

RETURN TO YOURSELF

Anger can deliver the message. You still choose the response.

You do not have to fear your anger, worship it, suppress it, or hand it complete authority. You can learn its language, honor what is true inside it, and still decide how you want to move.

Remember:
Regulation is not silence. Peace is not passivity. Accountability is not self-abandonment.
