QUEENS PEACE PALACE

THE FATHER WOUND RECLAMATION

A Guided Reflection for Grieving What Was Missing,
Rewriting the Pattern & Reclaiming Your Own Authority

SEE. GRIEVE. RECLAIM.

TO THY OWN SELF BE TRUE

The Inner Work Collection

Before You Begin

A father wound can grow around absence, inconsistency, criticism, emotional distance, broken trust, fear, unmet needs, or the experience of having a father who was physically present but emotionally unavailable. It can also include patterns you learned by watching him and later found yourself repeating.

The original Queens Peace Palace worksheet explored boundaries, anger, sadness, confidence and attraction to emotionally unavailable partners. It also centered several important truths: a father's emotional absence was not the child's fault, grief deserves room, and healing may require seeing the father who actually existed rather than only the father you hoped he would become.

> This workbook is not about putting every struggle in your life on your father.
> It is about noticing what the relationship taught you - consciously or unconsciously - and deciding what still belongs in your life now.

A note on support

This workbook is for personal reflection and education. It is not therapy, diagnosis, or crisis care. Family wounds can involve grief, neglect, abuse and trauma; if reflection becomes overwhelming, pause and consider support from a licensed mental-health professional or another qualified provider.

YOUR INTENTION

What would you like to understand, grieve, release or reclaim through this work?

Start with reality, not the role you wished he could fill.

A father can be loving in some ways and deeply disappointing in others. He can be absent, inconsistent, controlling, critical, warm, distant, protective, unreliable - or a complicated mixture. You do not have to flatten him into a hero or villain to tell the truth about your experience.

My father was...

What I received from him was...

What I needed but did not consistently receive was...

What is difficult for me to admit about our relationship?

A child's mind often turns absence into a verdict about itself.

When a parent does not show up emotionally or physically, children may conclude: I was not important enough. I was too difficult. If I had been better, he would have stayed, listened, protected me, or loved me differently. Adult you can revisit those conclusions with information younger you did not have.

What did younger you believe his behavior said about YOU?

What do you understand now about what belonged to HIS choices, limitations, circumstances or capacity?

What was never yours to carry?

Palace Reflection
You were the child. His responsibility to show up was not something you were supposed to earn.

You can grieve a person who is still alive - and a relationship you never fully had.

The original worksheet made room for mixed feelings: wanting a father's attention and love while also feeling anger, hurt or disappointment. Grief can include the actual father, the absent father, and the imagined father you kept hoping might eventually appear.

I grieve that I did not get...

I wish he had...

A moment I still wish had gone differently is...

What do you need permission to feel about him - even if two opposite feelings are true at once?

Did you learn to keep everyone out - or let everyone in?

Your original worksheet described both extremely firm and extremely loose boundaries: protecting yourself from disappointment by keeping people at a distance, or people-pleasing because saying no feels like a threat to love and belonging.

When closeness feels risky, I tend to...

- ■ Keep people at a distance
- ■ Become overly independent
- ■ Avoid asking for help
- ■ People-please
- ■ Say yes when I mean no
- ■ Overgive to stay valuable
- ■ Tolerate inconsistency too long
- ■ Expect people to disappoint me
- ■ Feel guilty when I set limits
- ■ Other: _____

What did boundaries mean in your relationship with your father?

What would a healthy boundary look like now - neither a wall nor an open door?

What are you actually angry about? What are you actually grieving?

Anger and sadness can become tangled together. The original worksheet described anger that has nowhere to go, sadness around absence, and conflict reactions that may carry more history than the present moment alone.

I am angry that...

Under that anger, I am sad that...

What did you need acknowledged that was never acknowledged?

Where does this old anger or sadness show up in your present relationships?

Familiar does not always mean safe.

Your original worksheet connected father wounds with attraction to emotionally unavailable partners and the unconscious pull to recreate familiar relationship dynamics. This is not destiny. Awareness gives you another option.

The kind of person or dynamic I repeatedly feel drawn toward is...

What about that dynamic feels familiar from childhood?

What happens inside me when someone is actually consistent, available and reliable?

What have I mistaken for chemistry that may actually be uncertainty, pursuit, proving or emotional distance?

Familiarity is information, not instruction.
You are allowed to choose relationships that feel different from what you learned first.

Whose approval are you still trying to earn?

A father's criticism, absence or emotional distance can become an inner critic long after childhood. Sometimes the adult is still performing for an audience that is no longer in the room.

Something I still wish my father would validate, recognize or be proud of is...

How has wanting that approval shaped your choices?

What are YOU proud of that does not need his agreement?

What would it mean to stop waiting for permission to believe in yourself?

You can inherit without repeating.

Your original prompts asked what you learned from your father that nobody else could have taught you. Reclamation is not only about what you reject. It can also include consciously choosing what was good, useful or meaningful - while refusing to repeat what harmed you.

Something valuable I learned from him is...

A strength of his I want to carry forward is...

A pattern of his I refuse to repeat is...

When I notice myself repeating it, I want to choose...

You do not have to become the opposite of your father to become yourself.
You can choose deliberately what stays and what ends with you.

Say what never had room to be said.

The original worksheet invited you to write a letter to your father containing what you needed, what you loved, what hurt, and what you wished would change. Keep that doorway - without requiring contact or reconciliation.

Dad, what I needed from you was...

What hurt me was...

What I appreciate or choose to keep is...

What I am no longer waiting for you to give me is...

What I am choosing for myself now is...

Acceptance does not require pretending.

The original worksheet presented forgiveness as an important step. In this edition, forgiveness is available but not compulsory. You may understand your father's humanity and still name the harm. You may forgive and maintain distance. You may love him and require boundaries. You may not be ready to forgive at all.

What does forgiveness mean to ME?

What would acceptance mean if it did NOT require approval of what happened?

What relationship with my father - if any - is actually sustainable for me now?

What boundary, distance or expectation protects my peace?

Give yourself what you kept waiting to hear.

The original affirmations centered love, protection, safety, worth, acceptance and the belief that what was missing in childhood does not have to remain missing forever. These statements keep that heart while centering your own authority.

“I did not cause an adult's inability to meet my needs.”

“I am worthy of love, protection, consistency and respect.”

“What I did not receive then is not proof that I cannot receive it now.”

“I can love someone and still see them clearly.”

“I do not have to repeat what was modeled for me.”

“I can become a safe, trustworthy authority in my own life.”

Write three statements that speak directly to YOUR father wound.

1.

2.

3.

What are you ready to stop waiting for?

Healing the father wound is not becoming someone who never needed a father. It is allowing the adult you are now to stop organizing your entire life around what was missing then.

I am ready to stop waiting for...

A relationship standard I am choosing differently is...

A boundary I am allowed to hold is...

A quality of healthy fathering I can now give myself - protection, encouragement, structure, reassurance, guidance, consistency, or something else - is...

One decision I can make from my own authority this week is...

THE PALACE CHECK-IN

Do not ask only, “Has my father changed?” Ask: “Am I seeing him clearly? Am I honoring what I needed? Am I choosing relationships that meet me differently? Am I becoming less dependent on his capacity to determine my peace?”

RETURN TO YOURSELF

You can stop waiting for the father you needed to become the person you need.

You are allowed to grieve what was missing without making absence your identity. You are allowed to appreciate what was good without denying what hurt. And you are allowed to build a life in which consistency, protection, encouragement, boundaries and love are no longer things you only know by their absence.

Remember:
His capacity shaped part of your beginning. It does not get final authority over what you choose from here.
